

END-OF-TERM TEST LISTENING SCRIPT

John: I have to write myself a note.

Lisa: Why?

John: I signed up to meet with my anthropology professor tomorrow, and I'm afraid that I might forget about it.

Bill: Then yes, you'd better write yourself a note. What's your meeting about?

John: My professor is planning to make a documentary, and he's looking for two students to help him carry out the project.

Lisa: What's the documentary about?

John: The culture of a small village in South America. He spent last summer studying it.

Lisa: Did he live with the villagers?

John: No, he lived by himself just outside the village.

Lisa: Hmmm. What kind of qualifications do the students need to have?

John: Well, the students must see themselves as optimistic and flexible people. And they have to be prepared to work long hours.

Lisa: Is your professor only looking for anthropology students?

John: Oh, no. The positions are open to all students.

Lisa: The project sounds interesting. I can see myself working on it. Since we know each other, you could recommend me for the job, couldn't you?

Bill: That's a great idea, Lisa. You promised yourself a fun and challenging job this summer. It sounds like this could be it.

John: Lisa, I don't know why I didn't think of that myself. Of course I'll recommend you, and I'll bring you an application to fill out.

Lisa: That would be great! Thanks, John. Do you know if we get to travel for free?

John: I'm not sure. Let me email my professor. I know that you'll have to have a passport, but I think the professor might receive money to support his trip. If that's true, then you may be able to go for free.

Bill: A free trip to South America? That sounds pretty amazing. I think I should apply, too!

John: Well, not all of us can go.

Bill: I was just joking. You know I have to work at my parents' business this summer.

John: That's right! I forgot about that.

Bill: Anyway, I really hope the both of you get to enjoy traveling to South America!

Lisa: Well, we can send you pictures!
