Evaluating Smoking Bans

Smoking bans have been around for decades. It's been a long time since people were allowed to smoke on airplanes or in offices. More recently, smoking has become illegal in restaurants, bars, and even public spaces in most states. While most welcome these changes, some have argued that these bans can have negative consequences. But reality suggests otherwise.

One group that has traditionally resisted smoking bans is restaurant and bar owners. Not allowing people to smoke in these places, owners claim, negatively affects their businesses. Research, however, suggests that forcing people to smoke outside has done nothing to the profits of businesses. In places such as New York City and San Francisco, where smoking has been illegal for a long time, there has been no change in the number of customers. In fact, the total population of smokers in these cities has decreased since smoking was banned.

Some have also claimed that allowing people to smoke outside of their offices helps them relieve stress. However, forbidding smoking in some industries has proved beneficial: Employees smoke less and are more productive. It turns out that not smoking at work helps people quit smoking completely, which creates happier and healthier employees. Though most companies still permit smoking outside of the office, some suggest completely prohibiting it near office buildings or places where people walk by.

After arguing for years about how smoking bans are bad, it seems bans have not done anything wrong: People smoke less and businesses have not lost customers. Hopefully, more will consider restricting smoking in other public places as well.
